Never use any software that you can't even approach it to a car show room, if you are even thinking about this stuff. I would rather use the simple and easy concept of "Use the Total Recoil" recoil compensation system. The company that makes that software is: I know this is asking for far too much money, and I would like nothing more than to set everyone free. However, my ability to do that is by far less than what you are paying me for. The App Store is, by far, one of the worst innovations in technology. You have a decent program, but much like the iTunes App Store, you will pay for your software, and then pay for the ability to keep your software up to date. I have a 10.8.3 computer that has 12 GB of memory. Sure it will run the 10.8.4 update, but that software update is $9.99. It is not a shocker that I have problems with it. In the recent years, different molecular materials containing either triplet excited or ground states have been developed and applied in a wide range of optoelectronic devices. Among these, azide-based molecules represent a versatile class of new materials, since they possess both characteristics, i.e. visible-light absorption and the ability to lower triplet energies by electron-exchange interaction (in the case of azides). Moreover, these materials can be constructed in various ways, enabling, for example, the preparation of new dimers and polymers. In this work, we report a combined experimental and theoretical study on the triplet excited states of different azide-based molecules, dimers and polymers, discussing in detail the role of the intermolecular interactions, with the goal of understanding their photophysical properties, in particular, how these influences the electronic structure of the systems, in combination with the photoinduced electron-exchange processes. The obtained results will contribute to the design of new materials for organic electronics
