Anatomic basis for left heart pacing in the coronary sinus in patients with hypertrophic cardiomyopathy. Patients with hypertrophic cardiomyopathy have selective pacing of the posterior left ventricular wall while conventional atrial (right atrial)-ventricular (RV) pacing is commonly applied. However, the anatomic basis for that pacing pattern is unclear. We investigated the coronary sinus anatomy and the relation of the coronary veins to the left atrial wall to identify the mechanisms underlying left ventricular (LV) pacing. A total of 14 patients undergoing either cardiac resynchronization therapy or surgery for hypertrophic cardiomyopathy were prospectively enrolled. Coronary angiography, MR imaging, and cardiac catheterization were performed in all patients. At each imaging session, the anterolateral wall of the left atrium was superimposed on the midplane of the left ventricle to measure the distance from the anterolateral wall to the lateral wall of the coronary sinus. A subepicardial coronary vein was defined as an accessory vein extending from the coronary sinus toward the LV. All patients had patent coronary sinus ostia on coronary angiography. Atrial-left ventricular pacing was achieved through the left coronary sinus in 11 patients and the right coronary sinus in 3 patients. At anterolateral sites of the LV ranging from the mid-LV free wall to mid-apical wall, pacing sites were lateral to the coronary
