This article has attempted to draw attention to the need for different responses to such issues by delineating the issues and analysing the key points. The implications of this analysis are suggested as a starting point for the development of improved policies. Apart from the central issue of widening participation, there are several other issues which merit consideration. One is the realisation that a more comprehensive approach to reviewing the migration of people is needed if we are to reduce the conditions which contribute to this, and instead build stronger social structures which will contribute to the social integration of these communities. The education system should take account of the presence of these communities and their particular needs, both in the school and through measures aimed at developing the capacity of the communities to prepare themselves for greater participation within society in general. The state has a major role to play in this, including the provision of adequate services to support the development of these communities which has been ignored to date. An important feature of the proposed research is the identification of an agency with a social aim that would be in a position to respond to the needs of these communities. This is reflected in the idea that community participation and social capital are important dimensions of community. It is important to note that these issues are not new.
