soon after sonic team's new venture had gotten off the ground, they discovered something shocking: sonic was simply not ready for a new generation. for years, the series' mascot had been a playable character in both arcades and handhelds - never breaking ground on anything truly new. many of the games were based on things they'd done before, and they could simply be ignored by sonic's new fans, who already knew what they did. with sonic team presenting the sega dreamcast to the world, they knew that they needed to do something extraordinary to represent the system. sonic wouldn't be the only new character on the team - there would be other prominent sega characters to accompany the series' mascot. sonic's longtime pal eggman, for instance, would need to come to an agreement with the blue blur, as they would become good business partners. yoshi and the super mario bros. would have to stick around, too - not to mention that there was going to be a breakout hit on the new system, with mario & luigi: partners in time being developed for the system's launch.

these were the kinds of colorful characters sonic team needed to feature in order to justify the system's existence. with those characters in mind, the first title to be announced would be a sonic spin-off - a property called sonic adventure. the story took place on a planet called mobius, where the population was subjected to an alien invasion, with sonic becoming involved as well. a handful of games would be built for the system, with sonic adventure serving as the flagship title. reviews of the title, however, would criticize the game for being too old-fashioned, the characters for being childish, and the gaming elements for being less than exciting.
